Law360 Pulse reporter James Boyle recently interviewed Flaster Greenberg Counsel Alexander Brown about moving his practice to Flaster Greenberg and shifting his focus from representing insurance companies to advising policyholders.

Brown told Boyle: "I was in an interesting place in my career as I was right on the edge of being made partner. I was convinced that if I made partner, my practice would stay as it was, representing insurance companies. If I ever thought about changing focus, now is the time to make the move."

Brown also said Flaster Greenberg offered him the opportunity to join the firm's litigation team and make that change to his practice. He knew a few of the attorneys at Flaster Greenberg and trusted the firm's reputation to follow through and essentially start rebuilding his client base.

"The idea of representing policyholders is exciting to me," Brown said. "As a litigator I will be helping individuals and businesses at all phases of insurance disputes, helping them get good results. Other pieces of my practice will involve pre-litigation matters, such as drafting letters and communication with clients and the insurance companies to hopefully resolve situations before litigation."

Brown also added: "I've been jumping in on some ongoing litigation to provide some interesting perspective. I have a general understanding of how insurance companies are operating internally and have a good sense on the basic fundamental and procedural hurdles that get claims held up."
